Run Free

Ever since I was a kid, I dreamt about living in a big city with all the neon lights, subway, traffic jams, exhaust fumes – you name it. I just couldn't bring myself to love living in a countryside, so I decided to escape.

But that's not to say that I didn't realize how hurt my parents would be once I leave, that's why I wrote a note for them in advance. Preparations were already made. I was lucky enough to be born with a great stamina, so running itself wouldn't be a problem. I decided to travel without a bag, cause it would only slow me down. So I took with me only the necessities – my phone, charger, earphones and some money. It was all I needed to buy food and contact my friend at whose place I would stay for a while before moving on.

And so the day has come. I waited for my parents to go to sleep, pinned a note on a lamp near their bed and left home. I ran for a while – by the time I reached the town border, the sun has already risen. I hopped ~~over~~^{over} the fence and continued my journey ^{but not} through the field.

Freedom was waiting ahead. I couldn't miss it.
