Jack had always preferred the comfort of his bedroom to the countryside. His grandmother, a hardworking and lively old lady, would always make him herd the animals. Frankly, he wasn't exactly opposed to the idea, but such efforts did it take that the pure thought of being given the task made him change.

One summer, after he had passed his exams, albeit not as successfully as he aspired to, granny met him with an eerily wide smile, gesturing to the largest stable. "dad, I think you're strong enough to mount old Ginger, aren't you?" Ginger was a brown mare, while no longer useful for long rides, she remained as agile as before. Jack was beaming with happiness – so many new possibilities appeared before him! He could go nearly anywhere, but started with a short trip to a nearby village. "I'll get up in the morning and set out immediately," the teenager promised to himself, clenching his fist.

Predictably, he overslept. Hastily equipping Ginger with a saddle and everything necessary, he led her to the old fence separating the village from the vast field. Delighted and visibly pleased with himself, Jack prepared to get on the horse's back.

Suddenly, thunder rumbled – or rather, a deep roaring sound similar to it, echoed in the distance. The animal, startled by it, let out a neigh and took off into the field. Jack's heart stood still. Having recovered from the shock, he approached the fence and leapt over it in one swift move which could've made all the youth in his city green with envy. Yelling out the horse's name, he sprinted forward, even though Ginger was already out of sight.

Work out and bursting with anger, he got to the nearby village in a few hours. Ginger was standing there, peacefully eating the grass. This time, he made sure to hold her, and repeated the outstanding jump to get on her back. And then, he rode the horse home.

After returning home, he announced:

"That's it! No more taking care of animals."

"What, are you going to spend time here? Wasting it on your computer games?" His mother scoffed. Jack shook his head. "No. I'm taking up parkour. Thanks to Ginger, I discovered that the only thing I'm good at is jumping."
