An unusual day.

He knew it was going to happen sooner or later. He felt tired of all the usual events going on in his life and always felt like running away.

While everyone was dreaming about a career in their town, about making money and being, what they called it, "successful", he didn't really want any of that. Maybe it's because his dad did the same thing when he was 18. The boy didn't wish for a big family, for a dream job, for any other achievements that seemed so valuable for others. He didn't want to pay bills, buy cars, to be dependent on pointless things. All he wanted was to be free and to discover new things. For sure, he didn't know where his destiny would take him, but that's what he enjoyed the most. The feeling of not knowing.

So it was his graduation day and all of his friends were getting ready for their speeches and receiving diplomas with tears of pure happiness in their eyes. It was a lovely sunny day, ~~there~~ there was not a single cloud in the sky, and his mind was just as clear as the deep blue sky above. He had never felt any happier. After listening to his mates' speeches and realising he was doing the right thing, without saying goodbye, he ran away and lived a happy free life, seeing places nobody had seen before.
