Bunking off never does good

I'd like to tell you a story that happened to me and my friend Tony last year.

"Let's play truant", - Tony offered to me one day. "Anyway, there will be a test, but we haven't prepared cheat sheets." I didn't like this idea because I understood that we wouldn't be able to avoid punishment. Detention wouldn't be the best of it.

"Come on", - insisted Tony. "That will be terrific! I hear that our school team is taking part in volleyball competitions. Why don't we ^{cheer them up}?"
As a matter of fact, that day there were district competitions. Of course, it was much more interesting than the lesson I couldn't help accepting that argument, though I felt really insecure.
We entered the gym and took back seats. The game started as soon as the referee blew the whistle. While our players were trying to score at list one point, the other team had already left ours behind. It was very disappointing.

Out of the blue, someone shouted, "You're dunces! Move faster!" It was like a reproach after which our school team woke up and started to show really good game. All the spectators were surprised at such a transformation. They couldn't believe their own eyes. The players, who had been as slow as snails at the beginning of the game, were rushing back and forth like rockets.

Of course, our team won. We felt so proud of them. We didn't regret missing the lesson, though a couple of days later we were punished for it and had to sit that terrible test anyway...
