Jack had always believed in the freedom of choice. And as he knew for sure that he would never need ~~the~~ Maths in his future, he steadily <sup>avoided</sup> doing homework and revising for tests. On that very day the class was going to have a test in Maths, but it did not matter for Jack.

Jack explained it to Harry, his best friend. On ~~the~~ hearing that Jack was planning to play truant, Harry cried: "Don't ~~to~~ even try to cheat sheet! That won't do! You're in a serious trouble!" Jack grinned. "Well, the situation isn't terrific. The worst punishment for it is detention, which doesn't bother me. Harry was too horrified to answer. He was not the one to risk and looked at Jack with misery. Such an attitude to studying was unbearable. If Jack was lucky, he would not be ~~dunce~~ dunced, but still his result would be too low.

The next day Mr. Peters entered the class, looking gloomy, frowned and addressed the pupils: "Young ladies and gentlemen, you have disappointed me with the results of your tests. The only one who has an "excellent" is Jack. ~~Seems like~~ It seems like he is more hardworking than all of you taken together!" Harry turned to Jack in astonishment. "You unfair coach potato! Weren't I your friend, I'd tell Mr. Peters you had been cheating!" Jack ~~looked~~ <sup>stared</sup> at him, his mouth widely opened. "I didn't manage to cheat. Mr. Peters was looking at me during the whole test!"
