As a man, who's fond of learning languages, I've immediately taken a chance, when my teacher offered me to enter an English-language contest, held by our school club. As the contestants of the previous year said, it would be a terrific show. In any way, I went in.

When we just went in, my old friend Danny came to me and said: "There will be an objective to write a rallying speech for the local demonstrators. As a matter of fact, I already have a text, written by my friend. Why wouldn't we use it to win?" I thought for a little bit and said: "Sure, why not. This should work out just fine." Danny's smile was brighter than the sun and happily, yet a bit nervously, he put his hand on a packet with the text, reeling around the study.

It all went pretty smooth, when it came to using our so-called "cheat sheet" – we rewrote the text, translating it from Russian to English and handed the papers in. For despite the others' happiness, it felt uncanny for me. And I wasn't wrong – when the results were proclaimed, the speaker mentioned our work and said that we're getting disqualified for cheating. A truly scuttling feeling I got there. Danny wasn't happy anymore too. We got home in one piece: cold, drenched, but having learnt an important lesson.
